THE SCHOLARSHIP

"AND the scholarship awards will be given to the most outstanding boy and girl from Glendale High School . . ."

The words came through to Gloria in a fog. She had waited for a chance to go to State University, and just when it looked like she could never go, here came the scholarship news. "Now, if I can just qualify . . ." she thought to herself.

Gloria raised her hand. "Where did you say the tests would be given, Miss Henslip?" Gloria asked.

"In study hall, at four o'clock Friday." Then the teacher looked at the rest of the senior class and announced, "All those applying for the tests, sign your names at the door as you leave."

Gloria burst from her seat, fishing for a pencil in her purse. She finally found one, but she was just in time to see Debbie Cavanaugh sign the finishing flourish to her name on the list too.

Just then a hand took her arm and she looked up into the tanned good-looking face of Jimmy Devereaux. "Oh, Jimmy . . . did you see what I just saw?" Gloria wailed.

"You mean old money-bags signing up for the scholarship? Sure!" Then Jimmy saw the look on Gloria's face. "Oh, don't let that getcha down, honey," he reassured her. "Even if they offered it to her, she wouldn't take it. She's going to some finishing school upstate."

"I know that," Gloria retorted. "But the school faculty doesn't know it! She'd take the scholarship just for prestige . . . but she wouldn't go to State."

"Well . . ." Jim was trying to think of something encouraging to say, but he couldn't quite make it.

"Oh, you're not worried! You've already got your sports scholarship, but I . . ." and a grim picture of her boy friend Jim going with a very chic Debbie Cavanaugh across State University campus made Gloria see red.

"Mother," she complained as soon as she got home, "that Debbie doesn't really need that scholarship, and I want it so much."

"I can't believe that anybody would be so mean as to deprive . . ." her mother began.

"Debbie would!" Gloria practically shouted. "And this is my one final chance to spend four years at the same university as Jimmy!" Gloria mourned.

"So that's it," Gloria's mother said sternly. "Just don't you forget, young lady, that you've also got a scholarship exam for the city college coming up, and that's just as good."

"Oh, mother," Gloria sighed. "It's not as good at all. They don't even have a football team!"

Then, as Gloria knew it would, came the inevitable lecture about schools and football teams. She knew it backwards and forwards, but her mother just never would understand how important sports and extracurricular activities were to a girl in college.

Once she tried to interrupt. She said, ". . . but Jimmy and I would probably just simply break up if we had to spend all those years apart."

And she just knew what the answer would be to that one too. So she sat and listened, but nothing could convince her that her life wouldn't be really ruined if she couldn't go to State University.

The next day finally came, and with it, another assembly where Miss Henslip announced that the scholarship exams for City College would be given in the study hall that afternoon. Dutifully, but with a sense of despair, Gloria trudged up the steps to sign her name to the list. Surprisingly enough, the list was longer than the one the day before.

"Why's everybody signing up for the chance to go to City College?" she asked Mike Richards.

"I don't know why everybody else is," Mike admitted, "but I am because it'll be an awful lot cheaper for me to go here. I can live at home and still get a college education."

"But the sports, and dorm life, and . . ." Gloria contradicted.

". . . and my mother and father's bank book!" Mike laughed, and wandered away to a vacant desk.

"I hadn't thought of it that way," Gloria told herself. "Even if I would get that scholarship to State, mother and dad would still have to pay for the dorm fees."

She took the exam, and with this new revelation foremost in her mind, she took a little more time with each answer. When she was finished, she was confident that she had made a pretty good showing.

When she finally got home about six that evening, her mother met her at the door. "Jim called several times this afternoon," she told her daughter. "He said he'd drop around about eight tonight."

"If he calls again," Gloria said, her jaw firm with resolution, "you tell him that I can't go out tonight. I'm going to bury myself in my books up in my room. The scholarship tests for State are tomorrow at four o'clock, and I'm going to be ready for 'em."

She heard the phone ring again after dinner, but she didn't go downstairs. She heard her mother give Jim the message and hang up, but she didn't move.

It must have been a half-hour later that she put down her empty coke bottle and walked over to the window of her bedroom. She stood there a little while, trying to get some answer by staring out into the night, when the screech of brakes interrupted her reverie.

Around the corner, careened Jim's car. The top was down, and she could see that he most certainly was not alone. There beside him, laughing and clutching his arm, was Debbie Cavanaugh!

It was a shock, but one which Gloria without even knowing it, was prepared for. "It sort of figures," she told herself. "I guess they're kind of meant for each other."

She went to bed early that night, and the next morning went off to school with a great show of bravado. She was glad, though, that her mother wished her good luck on the test.

Jimmy didn't come around much in the next week, and Gloria didn't seek him out. She didn't feel as bad as she thought she would. Of course, there were a lot of extra-curricular activities to keep her busy. She was on the Senior Banquet Committee, and found there was enough to do to keep her mind off both Jim and the scholarships.

The following week, Miss Henslip called all the seniors together in the assembly hall again.

"We're all here to find out about the winners of the scholarship tests," she began. Quiet descended upon the hall like a curtain.

"The race was close this year," she continued, and while everybody sat on the edge of their chairs, she went over the rules. "As you know, one person was to be chosen for the State University scholarship . . . and one boy and one girl for the City College scholarships . . ."

One hour later, Gloria banged through the front door shouting, "Mother . . . MOTHER! I made it!"

"The scholarship?" Her mother couldn't believe it. "You made the State University scholarship? That's wonderful . . ."

"No!" Gloria interrupted quickly. "I didn't even try for that. I mean the City College scholarship. Me and Mike Richards . . . out of the whole class!" She was so excited, she could hardly talk.

"But you wanted . . ." her mother began.

"No, not really, mother," Gloria smiled. "You see, I got to thinking about it, and I guess all those lectures you gave me started to sink in. There are more important things than social life at a University. That's why I wanted to go to City College."

Her mother smiled, then put her arms around her daughter. "One thing I don't think you'll have to learn in college, honey," she said, "is consideration and integrity. You've got straight A's in those already."
